Implications of digital inclusion, an emerging social determinant of health, and COVID-19

A message from Thomas Lane, NCPS, CRPS, senior director, community and recovery supports

Welcome to Magellan’s April 2020 edition of eMpowered for Wellness. In this month’s feature article, I’ll make the case for why I believe digital inclusion is an under recognized social determinant of health.

In the midst of the COVID-19 crisis, healthcare providers, including peer and family support specialists, are responding by transitioning to virtual visits via various telehealth platforms, making digital inclusion even more important today.

We are seeing peer support services adapting quickly, with peer-run and traditional provider organizations ramping up capabilities for tech-enabled/tech-assisted peer support. CMS is even relaxing some of the requirements for telehealth, in an effort to offer Medicaid and Medicare beneficiaries virtual access to healthcare providers. Many commercial insurers are following suit.

However, a digital divide exists across the U.S for many people. This is especially true for folks living with disAbilities and those reliant of publicly funded healthcare services. Many rural and frontier communities still do not have reliable high-speed internet service. In some cases, folks are dependent on dial-up connections. No matter where you live, you may not have access to the devices necessary for a digital connection. With the COVID-19 pandemic looking like it will continue to be of major concern for months to come, the role of telehealth and telemedicine has quickly come to the forefront of discussions about how folks can access healthcare in light of social distancing and stay-at-home orders.
