Leading in a multigenerational workplace

Did you know there are no less than five generations active in the workplace now? These include Traditionalists (the Silent Generation, born 1928 – 1945), Baby Boomers (1946 – 1964), Generation X (1965 – 1980), Millennials (1981 – 1996) and Generation Z (1997 onward).

Your colleagues and staff will likely be products of different eras. Knowing they have differing motivations, expectations and work styles will help you find value in everyone's perspectives, promoting stronger teamwork and creativity. Here are some tips for doing so.

- Arrange coaching that encourages employees of different ages to share their knowledge, including through reverse or reciprocal mentoring.
- Ask team members about their preferred communication methods and accept changing formats.
- Study and survey your team(s) to determine what matters most to different sets of employees, e.g., benefits, work flexibility, schedules, etc.

Mind Your Mental Health

Navigating mental health in a multigenerational workforce

Individuals from different generations have diverse levels of comfort discussing mental health issues at work. As a leader, you can help remove stigma and direct staff to supportive resources. Here are some steps you can take to accommodate the behavioral health needs of multiple generations in the workforce.

- Encourage a culture where employees of all generations become more comfortable discussing mental health concerns.
- Direct those in need to resources through your program.
- With mental healthcare a particular priority to younger generations, strive to reduce myths and stigma, while emphasizing the confidentiality of services, in your communications.
- Encourage attendance at wellness webinars and other trainings to help staff recognize their own mental health or substance abuse concerns and support colleagues.
- Maintain a workplace that values diversity and inclusivity, respecting the unique contributions of each generation.
- Schedule supportive, non-judgmental check-in sessions with staff so they have a safe space to discuss concerns.

Working on Wellbeing

Community wellbeing

Community wellbeing is about feeling safe where we live, taking pride in and supporting our communities. To weave wellbeing discussions into your individual and team meetings, consider asking the following questions:

What do you feel passionate about in your communities?

How can we get involved in our communities?

How does the work we do every day impact our communities?

Money Matters
